Australia's first Natural Medicine Week launched in May to promote a natural choice for Australians' health and wellbeing

The Australian Traditional-Medicine Society (ATMS) has today announced the launch of a new nation-wide initiative, Natural Medicine Week, 20 – 27 May 2016. It aims to raise awareness and educate consumers about the important role of natural medicine in the health and wellbeing of Australians.

A week-long initiative, the first of its kind and in its scope in Australia, Natural Medicine Week represents a vast range of natural medicine modalities across ingestive, bodywork and massage, and Traditional Chinese Medicine (TCM).

Natural Medicine Week combines valuable resources and information on natural medicine for the general public, alongside special events held all over Australia by ATMS accredited natural medicine practitioners, such as clinic open days and workshops.

Charles Wurf, CEO of ATMS, is pleased to announce Natural Medicine Week and encourages all Australians to get involved and learn more about how natural medicine can be a positive and complementary approach towards their health and wellbeing.

“Natural Medicine Week aims to provide Australians with the information and resources they need to make decisions about their future healthcare, dispelling myths about natural medicine along the way.

“On the Natural Medicine Week website we provide clear information about every ATMS-accredited modality, explain how natural medicine and health insurance work together, answer a whole range of FAQs and on top of that, there will be events and offers hosted by our qualified, accredited practitioners around Australia.

“We also encourage the public to head online and complete our survey – so that we can find out how people around the country are using natural medicine,” said Mr Wurf.

The results of the Natural Medicine Week survey into Australia's use of natural medicine will be released after the event.

Natural Medicine Week will kick off on Friday 20 May, running until Friday 27 May 2016.
